

Well here's a thought if you want to increase public benefit from the radio spectrum. Maybe you shouldn't be so quick to slap fines for indecency on Johnny Dare and Entercom Broadcasting. I may only be 17 years old but I know public benefit when I see it and Johnny Dare and his show has benefitted the Kansas City metropolitan area a hell of a lot more than the bureaucratic fatcats at the FCC. I'm sure anyone in this city could tell you that. When was the last time someone said "the FCC has sure been on their game lately" or "thank god for the FCC and their consistent regulatory actions or little Billy just might have turned out bad"? You won't hear it because it is not said. Here is a thought why don't you think about promoting the good in broadcasting instead of condemning stuff that isn't indecent at all when you think about it. You might find instead of plunging deeper into a never ending hole of immorality(that sounds like something you jive ass fools would say) that it all might make a turn for the better. Quit trying to make up for your own shortcomings and find some real direction. Maybe Johnny Dare could teach you a thing or two.
